Editor's Message

The weather has been a little crazy here with a Nor'easter making havoc up and down the east coast. I hope all our Falcon Club Family, and their Falcons are safe. Jeff sent me a text message telling me his electric will be off for a few days. So I told him to forget about sending a President's message. Our main message is on the upcoming 19th KCFCA Regional Meet. Be sure to call for reservations and send your KCFCA registration form ASAP. After April 6th the hotel will open up all the unused Falcon Club hotel rooms to the public. We really need your help at the Regional. Please consider signing up for guard duty on Friday and Saturday night. We could also use a Banquet Chair Person to help set up and coordinate the meal with the restaurant. Maybe you have some ideas for some center pieces too. We will need help in the hospitality room serving lunch on Saturday. Maybe you want to be in charge of setting up the Falcon wash bay. You would need to bring some hoses and spray nozzles. We could use some more door prizes to hand out at the banquet. Something new at the banquet is entertainment from the Jonestown Male Chorus. We will be going to Kauffman Chicken on Friday night at 6:00PM for the standard cruise. I hope you can make it to the Regional and enjoy some time "Talking Falcon". Hope to see you there. Bruce

TECH TIP from Norbar Torque Wrenches

Do Torque Wrenches Need To Be Wound Back To Zero After Use?

Certainly, if the wrench is wound back at all it should not be adjusted below the minimum scale marking (usually 20% of maximum) - never to zero as this can adversely affect the calibration of the wrench. Beyond that, it really depends on the application. We have thousands of Production Type wrenches in service that are left at their setting for months on end without a problem. Whilst the occasional user should adjust back to the minimum scale setting after use, if you use the wrench in an environment such as a commercial garage, the choice is yours. Either way is acceptable.

However, to make sure we were absolutely 100% certain of this, we carried out tests over the past month. We wanted to ensure that we could answer this long debated industry question with the upmost accuracy. The test was completed recently, designed to show the effects of leaving a torque wrench wound up at 100% of full scale against one wound down to 20% of full scale.

Firstly, four wrenches were taken and the calibration lab took results. Two wrenches were then left wound up and two wound down. After 24 hours the calibration lab took further results, and again after a week, then again after one month. At the end of the month the results showed (bar one single result) that all the readings taken were within the ISO tolerance of 4% of reading, regardless of whether the tool was wound up or down.

So there you have it. Although considered by some to be good practice, extensive testing has shown that unwinding a Norbar torque wrench to its minimum setting, hence relaxing the spring between uses, has no effect upon the wrench calibration.
